Redaction for Standards Compliance

Course Name: AL112 - Redaction for Standards Compliance - featuring Amped FIVE + Audacity

Recent legal changes in the United States have impacted the way in which agencies handle video / multimedia evidence requests from the public. Complying with the new laws, and maintaining compliance with state and federal privacy codes requires agencies to manage the processing of requests quite carefully. Requests for records around a critical event can quickly swamp an agency's staff given the new statutory time frames for the release of data.

For example, California Senate Bill 1421, Skinner (D. Berkeley), opens public access to internal investigations of police shootings and other incidents where an officer killed or seriously injured someone, as well to sustained findings of sexual assault and lying on the job.

Another example is California Assembly Bill 748, Ting (D. San Francisco), which requires police departments to release within 45 days audio or video footage of shootings or other incidents involving serious use of force, unless it would interfere with an active investigation.

This course will get the agency and their redaction staff up to speed on the issues and the technology necessary to bring the agency into compliance with the new laws.

Redaction for Standards Compliance

General Information

Expectations and Goals

This class is for those employees involved in the processing of video evidence for their agency. After an overview of the technological and legal aspects of working with video evidence in a law enforcement setting, basic job costing, triage, redaction, and quality control techniques are discussed in light of the laws regarding public records releases. The curriculum is presented with strong emphasis on the work flow required to process this unique type of evidence. Graduates will thus acquire training in the techniques and skills necessary to perform redactions in a “compliance based” setting as well as to package, deliver, and present those findings in their local context.
